The Daily Press
HONGKONG, SEPTEMBER 19TH, 1893.

Few more audacious attempts to shuffle out of treaty obligations have ever been made than that of the Chinese Government to put a stop to the importation of machinery. All articles not enumerated in the prohibited list included in the Tariff Rules may be legally imported—nothing could be clearer than that—but the Tsung-hi Yamen coolly dismisses this difficulty by saying that “Articles that is right and proper to prohibit cannot all be enumerated in treaties.” If the right were conceded to the Chinese to prohibit the importation of machinery, which is a legitimate and recognised article of commerce, they might equally claim the right to prohibit the importation of any other articles, say piece goods or metals. The Yamen says that the tariff refers to “ordinary articles of merchandise in trade.” Machinery comes within this description. It is provided that articles not included in either the import or export tariff shall pay an ad valorem duty of 5 per cent, and nothing can be clearer than that machinery, not being enumerated in the tariff nor amongst the prohibited articles, comes under this provision. Notwithstanding this, orders have been issued prohibiting the landing of steam machinery, whether it be intended for natives or foreigners. The enforcement of these orders would therefore stop all foreign manufacturing enterprise at the Treaty Ports as well as Chinese enterprise. That the Chinese Government may, outside the limits of the Treaty Ports, prohibit the establishment of steam manufacturers cannot of course be denied, for foreign Governments have acquired no right of interference in the internal government of the country. The Chinese Government might declare the use of machinery a nuisance, just as it is at present sought in Hongkong to have the fat boiling industry declared a nuisance, and the authorities might proceed to clear out the steam using factories, if any were established, as the Colonial Surgeon says he and the Registrar-General “cleared out the whole boiling” of fat boilers on a former occasion, before the establishment of the Sanitary Board and when “they had not to refer to any law.” The Chinese contend that the adoption of steam machinery would take away the people’s means of livelihood, which is altogether fallacious, but it becomes less surprising that such a notion should be entertained by ignorant Chinese officials when we find an enlightened Governor of Hongkong objecting to the introduction of tramways into the Colony on precisely similar grounds, namely, that the tramways would interfere with the jinrikisha traffic. We may therefore credit the Tsung-hi Yamen with honest desire to prevent injury to their country, and a sincere belief that they are doing so, in attempting to prohibit the use of steam machinery. But they cannot be allowed to effect their purpose by prohibiting the importation, because such importation is clearly legal according to the Tariff Rules, which have the same binding force as the Treaty under which they were made; nor can they prohibit the use of machinery by foreigners at the Treaty Ports if Chinese subjects outside the limits of the Treaty Ports are not allowed to use steam machinery they will not buy it, and if there are no buyers there will be no importation, beyond what is sufficient to meet the requirements of the Foreign Settlements, but it is not by interference with the tariff that this result is to be attained. There may be some difference of opinion as to whether the Chinese Government have the right to prohibit the use of machinery by natives within Settlement limits, but clearly they have no shadow of a claim to interfere with its use by foreigners, as is shown by the quotations from the various Treaties cited by the dozen of the diplomatic body at Peking in his despatch to the Tsung-hi Yamen with reference to the importation of cotton
